long, before I received an order, directing me to change my station to Dundas Pt. a place within the same district and not many miles from Port Mouat. I had to shift bag and bag-gage accordingly and come over to my new residence^

This Dundas Point, I found, was a much bigger place than the one I had left, with accom-modations for not less than three to four hundred men at the very least. There was a huge brick field, and a couple of brick furnaces, that worked for about three months in the year; for which time, people from different parts of the settlements had to be sent there to work in brick-making* Though for the rest of the year round, the place had nothing much of import-ance to talk of there, and looked quite forsaken and desolate, yet during the brick-making seasons, it turned out to be one of the most important centres of work, and people gathered together in such numbers as to give to the place almost the appearance of a noisy bustling bazar.
